

The Oil Drum: Campfire

Discussions about Energy and Our Future

Campfire and Human Capital - What Do You Want to Learn?

Posted by Nate Hagens on June 17, 2009 - 7:10pm in The Oil Drum: Campfire

Topic: Environment/Sustainability

Tags: campfire, human capital [list all tags]

It has been about six months since we started the Campfire series on The Oil Drum. The intent was to host an outlet for those who were reasonably convinced that peak oil and energy descent begin now. The schedule is on Wednesdays to have 'practical' guest posts from 'experts' on various aspects of human capital (skills and knowledge) that might be useful for the community to learn and discuss. The Saturday slot was for some of the larger and more difficult questions we face as a society in an overshoot situation.

The 'guest post' larder since the start of Campfire has been on the bare side (with some stellar exceptions). Tonights post is a blank slate for you to articulate what 'practical' topics you would like covered in future posts. Since peak oil likely means more localization and a move towards self-reliance, essays and expertise on food/water/energy will clearly be of interest. But information on health, psychology, leisure, etc. in a post-peak world will be equally interesting.

This slot is to create social capital via sharing human capital within this community (so in some ways is a microcosm of post-peak culture itself)...

What would you like to learn?

This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-Share Alike 3.0 United States License.